"THERE is a dead man there," said Spargo.

He himself was mainly curious about the details of this exhumation; he had no scruples, sentimental or otherwise, about the breaking in upon the dead. He watched all that was done.

"They're down to it!" whispered Breton.

Presently they all went and looked down into the grave. The workmen had uncovered the coffin, preparatory to lifting it to the surface; one of them was brushing the earth away from the name-plate. And in the now strong light they could all read the lettering on it.

JAMES CARTWRIGHT CHAMBERLAYNE

Spargo turned away as the men began to lift the coffin out of the grave. "We shall know now!" he whispered to Breton. "And yet—what is it we shall know if—"

"If what?"

But Spargo shook his head. This was one of the great moments he had been working for, and the issues were tremendous.

"Now for it!" said the Watchman's solicitor in an undertone. "Come, Mr. Spargo, all gathered round the coffin, set on low trestles at the graveside, as he worked silently went to work on their sockets; they grated as the men slowly worked them out. It seemed to Spargo that each man grew slower and lower in his movements; he felt that a himself was getting dizzy. Then he heard a voice of authority.

"Lift the lid off!"

A man at the head of the coffin, a man at the foot suddenly and swiftly raised the lid; the men gathered round craned their necks with a quick movement.

Sawdust!

The coffin was packed to the brim with sawdust, tightly pressed down. Somebody laughed faintly. The sound of the laughter broke the spell.

"It is evident that there were good reasons for suspicion," he remarked. "Here is no dead body, gentlemen. See if anything lies beneath the sawdust." he added, turning to the workmen.

"Turn it out!"

The workmen began to scoop out the sawdust with their hands; one of them, evidently desirous of making sure that no body was in the coffin, thrust down his fingers at various places along its length. He, too, laughed.

"We are going to seal them up at once, and take them to London," replied the principal person in authority. "They will be quite safe, Mr. Spargo; have no fear. We don't know what they may reveal."

"You don't, indeed!" said Spargo. "But I may as well tell you that I have a strong belief that they'll reveal a good deal that nobody dreams of, so take the greatest care of them."

"Then, without waiting for further talk with any one, Spargo hurried Breton out of the cemetery. At the gate, he seized him by the arm.

"Now, then, Breton!" he commanded. "Out with it!"

"With what?"

"You promised to tell me something—a great deal, you said—if we found that coffin empty. It is empty. Come on—quick!"

"All right. I believe I know where Elphick and Cardlestone can be found. That's all."

"All right. Where, then, in heaven's name?"

"Elphick has a queer little place where he and Cardlestone sometimes go fishing—right away up in one of the wildest parts of the Yorkshire moors. I expect they've gone there. Nobody knows even their names there—they could go and lie quiet there for—ages."

"Do you know the way to it?"

"I do—I've been there."

Spargo motioned him to hurry. "Come on, then," he said. "We're going there by the very first train out of this. I know the train, too—we've just time to snatch a mouthful of breakfast and to send a wire to the Watchman, and then we'll be off. Yorkshire—God, Breton, that's over three hundred miles away!"

Forested
TRAVELING all that long summer day, first from the southwest of England to the Midlands, then from the Midlands to the north, Spargo and Breton came late at night to Hawes Junction, on the border of Yorkshire and Westmoreland, and saw rising all around them in the half darkness the mighty bulks of the great fells which

Motorists try this

Go to a reliable dealer or garage. Have your crank case thoroughly drained, cleaned and the reservoir filled with SUNOCO Motor Oil of the proper type—your dealer knows which. Then notice how much easier your car operates.

You will find, as others have discovered, that SUNOCO is the most-efficient lubricant you have ever used. This efficiency reduces repair bills, saves gasoline and oil and lessens the depreciation of your car. Here's the reason for this efficiency.

SUNOCO MOTOR OIL

is a clean, accurate, uniform oil; contains the smallest possible amount of free carbon; is of the proper consistency for thorough lubrication; has low cold test—does not congeal in cold weather because it does not contain paraffin; made in six different types to take care of all cars.

SUNOCO Motor Oil is sold by selected dealers and garages who have at their command complete data, which enables them to prescribe the correct lubricant for your particular car. Look for the dealer who displays the SUNOCO sign.

SUNOCO is sold in any quantity; also in 1 and 5 gallon sealed cans and in handy drums for home garages.
